"A Painter of Our Time" offers an in-depth examination of the work of the renowned artist Francis Bacon, while "Maintaining Appearances" explores the complex relationship between art and photography. He explores how images can be used to manipulate and control, and how they can shape our perceptions of ourselves and others.

In "The Looking Glass," Berger examines the act of looking and the ways in which we interpret visual information. He argues that seeing is not a passive process but rather an active one, influenced by our experiences, beliefs, and expectations. Berger invites us to question what we see and to consider the multiple perspectives that exist within any given image.
